FINE HUMANITY.

Every now and then some fine example of noble manhood or womanhood comes to prove the possibilities of human nature. However often man sinks below the suimal, when he rises to a height that is godlike, it must be thought that this is his nature at its best, and not something extrinsic. A young woman is here on her way to PLATE is a bad adjunct to the bill, and if he could be neatly dropped and the thing put through without him, so much the better. The less of politics there is in the World's Fair the better, and the PLATE type is the worst of all. But first and foremost is the bill. Have that, even with PLATE, because have it we ought.

whooped things up in a lurid way even for that locality. He was a standing target for all the young gentlemen with guns in the neighborhood. Finally his home was surrounded and the lively Marquis was obliged to kill one or two of them.

Now he is in Paris, and has been devoting himself to railroads in China. This sort of thing was insufferably tame. Not to hear a bullet whistling by him every now and then made his Parisian existence a painful monotony. He is going to rectify this. Sunday morning he will stand up before a Frencheditor, who will practise on him with a pistol. 'The Marspain will also take a shot. This is a brilliant scheme, and the noble Lord will soon recover his bright, sunny temper
